

Entanglement.

The oldest human remains discovered are about 500,000 years old.

Since that time, roughly 118 billion humans have lived and died.

Entanglement first began when two or more people created a bond of loyalty and friendship while they were alive. After they died, the threads that joined them remained connected. The bond wasn't always because of good; sometimes, negativity created a lasting thread.

Suppose the first two humans were so close, for whatever reason, that they could feel each other when separated, as many of us have experienced knowing when a friend, spouse, or child was in physical or emotional trouble. In that case, that connection is an example of entanglement. Entanglement seems to carry on after death and might even endure for eternity.

Entanglement is hectic when we look at entanglement from today and then backward in time.

Looking from the beginning, entanglement is easier to comprehend. First, there were two strands between the first two humans. More strands were added as the population increased, with strands eventually crossing from different continents as humans migrated. Since those first two strands of the first two humans, there are now a minimum of 109 billion strands for all the humans who have lived and died. In a family of five, if each member had a strand to the others, and the others added strands to their families and close friends, you can imagine the number of threads growing exponentially in the entanglement. And that only counts the humans.

Entanglement also occurs between humans and animals and between animals and animals.

Of course, the Creator must be added to the entanglement of all things because I believe the Creator is the force that created the first two building blocks that are responsible for all of the ensuing creations. Those first two building blocks are dark matter and dark space, and within them, the Creator infused itself. The Creator chose to use an infinite amount of its energy to create all there is and all there will be and to give all creatures the ability to choose right from wrong. By infusing itself into all things, created and uncreated, the Creator ensured the entanglement of all things.

Understanding anything so mighty and so improbable as creation itself is impossible. But breaking creation down to its probable parts can bring sanity to insanity.

As I look back on my life, now understanding the entanglement of everything, I realize I have lived on the prow of my being. I chose my routes. I am responsible for my journey, so there have been no times when I was a victim. Sometimes, I thought I was a victim, but perhaps the entanglement took me exactly where I was supposed to go and got me there on time.

Perhaps over half a million years since man first evolved, many of us have lived many lives, and maybe we haven't always chosen right from wrong. The threads of entanglement may also alter this life's journey, allowing us to make amends for past wrongs. Or perhaps we didn't reach a goal we wanted to reach, so we get another chance with this or other lives.

It's odd how some people find this life so easy to navigate, and they live comfortable lives, while others cannot figure it out and live in abject poverty. What is the difference?

Some people are born followers, others are born leaders, and some are born to neither lead nor follow. They are the nomads of life who don't care what society deems important. These nomads are sure that life is about more than money, power, politics, or religion, and they spend their lives proving it to themselves.

People are vastly different in the amount of knowledge they seem to come into their world with. Some are only now learning the rudimentary parts of life, while others are born with that instilled in them, so their starting line is way ahead of the others.

Some profoundly religious peoples believe in Akashic records, a collection of pictorial records of everything that has occurred since the beginning of time. These records are said to exist in the astral light known as Akasha, which spiritualists describe as a fluid gas that exists beyond the range of human senses. If you can find a person with access to the Akashic records, they can read your history.

I add the above to acknowledge there is much I do not know, and there is much that may be true that I have chosen to discount. I have taken time to satisfy my curiosity about several aspects of spirituality humans believe in or follow that are not mainstream. Still, I have not had time to investigate them thoroughly, so I cannot say whether a thing is true.

Are Akashic records true? Is the Bible an actual historical record of creation? Is there a heaven, purgatory, and hell? Does God exist? Is there an afterlife? Are emotions existential to life?

How can we connect all the dots in our lives while bombarded by many distractions?

One thing is sure: we will all find out what is true about the same time that our bodies die.
